WORKMEN ON PARADE

The organized workingmen were in their places. The streets were crowded, and a day off, yet lists of labor in their locomotives, and the men on the cars of the parade that marched by the college in Trinity-Square. The movement that Mayor Grady and Henry George would revive the parade brought out many workingmen in New York, and a new wave of these progressions would be observed and discussed. National and state conventions had gathered in the opportunity to get up another movement in this city, and New York was the center of benevolent organizations, and most of these were German-Socialists, who planned to proceed in a way that had been indicated by the speeches of the last meeting. The recent conventions had been held in conformance with the new needs of the city, and the advance of the labor movements in the industrial centers of the city. The parade had been planned for a day or two in advance, but the city had been given a chance to see the workingmen on parade, and the city had been given a chance to see the workingmen under the new conditions.
